Abstract

Gender and Space in a Global World

In an increasingly globalized world, cross-cultural collaboration has become critical. This Linnaeus-Palme collaboration aims at strengthening the research, teaching, and theorization of gender in two different institutional settings, i.e. the Dept. of Gender Studies, Lund University and the Dept. of Geography, University of Delhi. With a rapidly changing labor market and shifting professional demands, it is important to enhance the quality of teaching and the possibilities of students through a mobility program. While the staff exchange will allow for new thoughts and ideas which will be brought back to the classroom in their home departments, the student exchange will both enrich students’ perspectives and make them able to include courses in their portfolios not offered at their home departments. Anyone involved in the exchange will be able to question established pre-understandings and established truths perpetuated in their academic home environment. Hence, both teachers and students will gain important insights due to their visit in a different socio-cultural environment abroad. This collaboration wishes to create a mutually beneficial space for both institutions within which to reflect positively on diversity and difference, cooperate, and collaborate in a global world where individuals experience increased differentiation as regards rights, living conditions, and possibilities in their lives.